

Summer reading: Full study now available

Newly published research provides a deeper understanding of how different cushion designs -- including the Ride Java Cushion -- work.

Read the full study here in the Journal of Tissue Viability.

We have the evidence: review summaries of all relevant wheelchair seating research here.

A peek inside the process...

Here's an almost-mesmerizing part of the process of making a Ride Custom Back. Hot, high-grade prosthetic plastic is vacuum-formed to a specific client's back shape. Watch the video here.

Once it cools, Ride technicians will cut the back out and begin adding the materials for breathability and comfort. The finished back provides custom-fit, lightweight stability. A well-fitting back truly works in tandem with a cushion, to help relieve pressure and increase stability.

Light bulb moments?

Got an idea that could help change the lives of those with lower-limb paralysis? There's still time to enter Toyota's Mobility Unlimited Challenge. Deadline for entries is August 15.

Now showing...

A film about irreverent cartoonist John Callahan, starring Joaquin Phoenix, is now in theaters. Check out this New Mobility review of "Don't Worry, He Won't Get Far on Foot" and watch the trailer here. Popcorn, anyone?

Increasing accessibility awareness...

"The thing about accessibility is that it's not something that just disabled people should be working on. Accessibility is something that all of us should be working on." -- Amanda Reaume

For Amanda Reaume, acquiring a disability meant awakening to a civil rights movement in a way made possible through lived experience. Interesting article about disability legislation in British Columbia; these issues are universal. Read more here.
